

Evaluating Qualitative Research for Social Work Practitioners

Cynthia A. Lietz
Luis E. Zayas

Abstract: In the field of social work, practitioners must remain well informed regarding research advances in their respective areas. Proponents of evidence-based practice expect social workers to engage in practice informed by the best available evidence. Research studies conducted through the lens of qualitative inquiry provide important contributions to the social work knowledge base. In many cases, these studies can represent the best available research regarding emerging problems or application of evidence to diverse populations. Yet, despite the relevance of qualitative research, many social workers receive minimal training regarding qualitative methodology hindering their ability to conduct and evaluate research that uses qualitative methods. The purpose of this article is to provide students and practitioners some orientation regarding qualitative research methods and to highlight potential strategies researchers and consumers of research may use to evaluate the trustworthiness and quality of qualitative research. Specifically, the concept of trustworthiness is defined in the context of qualitative inquiry and questions social work practitioners can ask when evaluating the quality and applicability of a qualitative research study are provided.

Keywords: Qualitative, research methods, trustworthiness

INTRODUCTION

As social workers intervene with individuals, families, and communities, it is critical to remain informed regarding the literature base and research advances specific to one's field of practice. The National Association of Social Workers (NASW)'s Code of Ethics (1999) asserts the importance of engaging in practice informed by prevailing research when it states "social workers should critically examine and keep current with emerging knowledge relevant to social work." Similarly, the Council on Social Education (CSWE) recently identified ten core competencies of social work practice, one of which involves engaging in "research-informed practice and practice-informed research" (Holloway, Black, Hoffman, & Pierce, 2009, p. 2). Moreover, the evidence-based practice (EBP) movement has increased the expectation that social workers actively seek research findings related to their particular domain of practice (Howard, McMillen, & Pollio, 2003; Jenson, 2005). Specifically, EBP asserts social workers make decisions guided by research evidence working in conjunction with clinical expertise and client preferences (Gambrell, 2007; Gilgun, 2003; McNeece & Thyer, 2004).

Although most would agree with the importance of identifying and reading research articles related to one's area of practice, there are many challenges social workers face as they seek to achieve this goal (Adams, Matto, & LeCroy, 2009). First, social workers are under increased pressure to do more in less time. Caseloads are increasing and budget

Making Data Talk David E Nelson, Bradford W Hesse, Robert T Croyle, 2009-05-20 The demand for health information continues to increase but the ability of health professionals to provide it clearly remains variable The aim of this book is 1 to summarize and synthesize research on the selection and presentation of data pertinent to public health and 2 to provide practical suggestions based on this research summary and synthesis on how scientists and other public health practitioners can better communicate data to the public policy makers and the press in typical real world situations Because communication is complex and no one approach works for all audiences the authors emphasize how to communicate data better and in some instances contrast this with how to communicate data worse rather than attempting a cookbook approach The book contains a wealth of case studies and other examples to illustrate major points and actual situations whenever possible Key principles and recommendations are summarized at the end of each chapter This book will stimulate interest among public health practitioners scholars and students to more seriously consider ways they can understand and improve communication about data and other types of scientific information with the public policy makers and the press Improved data communication will increase the chances that evidence based scientific findings can play a greater role in improving the public s health Community-oriented Primary Care Paul A.
