This book discusses the current status of international patent protection as regards computer implemented inventions. CII explains why copyright is inadequate and describes how patents are being used by Microsoft and the Apache Software Foundation to support a wide range of business objectives. Over the past decade, extensions in the scope of patent protection to include computer implemented inventions have generated controversy, concern and a great deal of hyperbole. In Europe, the debate over software patents has been bitter and rancorous and the directive to harmonize European patent law with EPO practice faces an uncertain future. The business approach of this book is highlighted by a comprehensive listing of strategic business
