Implementing Comprehensive School Health Programs: Prospects for Change in American Schools

Gordon H. DeFreese, Cathy L. Crossland,
Bettye MacPhail-Wilcox, Jacquelyn C. Suvers

Participants in The National Invitational Conference on Comprehensive School Health Programs left Atlanta feeling that the immediate future of school health education in this country is both challenging and filled with promise. In this final paper, written some weeks after the conference, we bring together the numerous threads of discussion that took place in Atlanta bearing on future prospects for implementing comprehensive approaches to school health programs in American schools.

The ideas summarized in this paper are important because they emerged so significantly in this national meeting of representatives from the most prominent health and educational organizations in the U.S. As such, the ideas represent a "state-of-the-art" profile of policy-oriented perspectives in the field of health education and school health programs. Some issues generated high consensus, while others produced disagreement. But, taken as a whole, the Carter Center discussions in the summer of 1989 clearly substantiated the need for unequivocal approaches to school health programs development, the feasibility of certain program development strategies, and the potential for success of these initiatives when properly executed in community settings.

WHY PROMOTE SCHOOL HEALTH PROGRAMS AND SERVICES?

Like all instrumental public service agencies, school systems are sensitive to any change or expansion of their basic mission or responsibility, with or without provi-

DeFreese, PhD, Professor, School of Medicine and Education, and Director, Health Services Research Center, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, Campus Box 7430, Chapel Hill, NC 27599-7430; Cathy L. Crossland, PhD, Dean of Curriculum and Instruction, The High School, North Carolina State University, Raleigh, NC 27695; Bettye MacPhail-Wilcox, PhD, Dept. of Educational Leadership and Psychology, North Carolina State University, College of Education and Psychology, North Carolina State University, Raleigh, NC 27890-4260; Jacquelyn C. Suvers, MPH, Senior Associate, One Third Ave., Minneapolis, MN 55401. The National Invitational Conference on Comprehensive School Health Programs was held May 21-23, 1989, at the Carter Center, Atlanta, and was jointly sponsored by the National Association of State Directors of Education, the National Council for Health Education, the Division of Assessment and Research Studies, Center for Children, Disease Prevention and Health Protection, Office for Student Support, The American Hospital Association, and the Atlanta Service Research Center of the Commission on Accreditation of College and Hospital for the last year that participant for the W. sion of additional resources. Every service-providing institution is entrenched in the clearest possible definition of its mission and guards against those seeking to expand its scope of services and expected outcomes beyond its capacity to deliver. Schools are no different. They have felt assailed, blamed, and criticized so much over the past 15 years that it is understandable to anticipate strong resistance to an expanded set of expectations regarding educating students in the area of health, or to providing direct health services.

There is, however, a growing appreciation of many important social and health goals and objectives among school administrators and teachers. However, it remains to know how schools can go in advancing these responsibilities. Some authorities maintain that schools constitute the single most important social institution available for addressing the need for health education and health-service goals for America's youth. Allensworth and Kolbe's maintain that "Individuals could do worse perhaps than any other single agency in society to help young people, and the adults they will become, to live healthier, longer, more satisfying, and more productive lives."¹ To illustrate the important role schools may play, Michael McGinnis, MD, Deputy Assistant Secretary, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services and Director, U.S. Office of Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, wrote:

Health is very clear in that education and health for children are intrinsically intertwined. A student who is not healthy, who suffers from an undetected vision or hearing defect, or who is hungry, or who is deprived for drugs or alcohol, is not a student who will profit from the educational process. Likewise, an individual who has not been provided education in the subjects of healthy nutrition, biology, and behavior early in life, will be more likely to suffer the consequences of reduced productivity in later years.

Yet, conference participants acknowledged the difficulty theoretically associated with attempts to place education (and other issues associated with it) on the public agenda. When education assumes broad national importance, the recognition often follows a "crisis" requiring involvement of the highest levels of government. Furthermore, most funding for public education in the U.S. comes from the state level, not the federal. Local funds have become the "discretionary" resources for ensuring that "extra" funds are available to support curricula, personnel, or activities beyond minimal levels.

Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education, 1976 WHO guideline on school health services World Health Organization, 2021-06-22

WHO has long recognized the link between health and education and the potential for schools to play a central role in safeguarding student health and well-being. In 1995 WHO launched the Global School Health Initiative which aimed to strengthen approaches to health promotion in schools. This WHO guideline on school health services will contribute to the creation of a common language around school health services will promote evidence-based care through its menu of interventions will strengthen school nursing and school health professions around the world and ultimately will improve the health of children Comprehensive School Health Education Unesco, World Health Organization, UNICEF, 1992 Federal Register, 2013-02 An Introduction to Community Health James F. The fifth edition of this best-selling introductory text has been updated to reflect the latest trends and statistics in community health in an effort to effectively address the health issues facing today's communities with emphasis on developing the knowledge and skills necessary for a career in health education. An Introduction to Community Health Fifth Edition covers such topics as epidemiology, community organization, program planning, minority health, health care, mental health, environmental health, drugs, safety, and occupational health. Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, 1992 Implementation Jeffrey L. Pressman, Aaron Wildavsky, 1984-06-05

This book confronts the widespread impression that policy or program implementation should be easy, arguing instead that implementation even under the best of circumstances is exceedingly difficult. Using the Oakland Project as a case study, this book discusses each stage of the process of implementation, demonstrating that completion of what might seem to be a simple sequence of events will in fact depend on a complex chain of reciprocal interactions. Each part of the chain must be built with the others in view so the separation of policy design from implementation is fatal. The first four chapters illustrate the movement from simplicity to complexity. Chapter 5 discusses the number of decision points throughout the process, giving an indication of the magnitude of the task. Chapter 6 examines why project targets may be set even if they are unlikely to be met, considering both the position of those who set targets top federal officials who wish large accomplishments from small resources in a short time and those who must implement them career bureaucrats and local participants characterized by high needs and low cohesion. The last chapter discusses the relationship between the evaluation of programs and the study of their implementation, arguing that tendencies to assimilate the two should be resisted. Hearings, Reports, Public Laws United States.
