Implementing The Uruguay Round:

Implementation of Uruguay Round Commitments Joseph Michael Finger, 2016 At the Uruguay Round developing countries took on obligations not only to reduce trade barriers but also to undertake significant reforms of regulations and trade procedures The Round did not however take into account the cost of implementing these reforms a full year's development budget for many of the least developed countries nor did it ask whether the money might be more productive in other development uses At the Uruguay Round developing countries took on unprecedented obligations not only to reduce trade barriers but to implement significant reforms both of trade procedures including import licensing procedures and customs valuation and of many areas of regulation that establish the basic business environment in the domestic economy including intellectual property law and technical sanitary and phytosanitary standards This will cost substantial amounts of money World Bank project experience in areas covered by the agreements suggests that an entire year's development budget is at stake in many of the least developed countries Institutions in these areas are weak in developing countries and would benefit from strengthening and reform But Finger and Schuler's analysis indicates that the obligations reflect little awareness of development problems and little appreciation for the capacities of the least developed countries to carry out the functions that these reforms of regulations and trade procedures address The content of these obligations can be characterized as the advanced countries saying to the others Do it my way Moreover these developing countries had limited capacity to participate in the Uruguay Round negotiations so the process has generated no sense of ownership of the reforms to which membership in the World Trade Organization obligates them From their perspective the implementation exercise has been imposed imperially with little concern for what it will cost how it will be carried out or whether it will support their development efforts This paper a product of Trade Development Research Group is part of a larger effort in the group to support effective developing country participation in the WTO system This research was supported by the global and regional trust fund component of the World Bank Netherlands Partnership Program

Implementing a WTO Agreement on Trade Facilitation J. M. Finger,John Sullivan Wilson,2006 Contrary to the prevailing view that the Doha negotiations have achieved little the authors find that on trade facilitation much progress has been made This is particularly true in regard to action by development banks and bilateral development agencies to meet client demand for assistance in reform Active private sector participation has been an important factor driving change Many agencies have been involved in this work The authors find that their roles have been consistent with their comparative advantages As to how the international community can best support continued progress the authors conclude in favor of a cautious approach to the imposition of new WTO obligations in the area of trade facilitation On the whole this is the approach the WTO has taken for example by limiting its negotiations on trade facilitation to several specific provisions of the GATT The WTO can continue to function as a catalyst for reform It is perhaps uniquely placed to relate the trade facilitation agenda to the overall trade agenda On design and construction of the relevant infrastructures and capacities to spur development the development institutions including bilateral agencies should continue to lead The authors find little evidence to support the need for a comprehensive new platform or mechanism to channel trade related aid as part of implementation of any new agreement at the WTO on trade facilitation They recommend however that an innovative approach to using the well established but under utilized Trade Policy Review Mechanism be considered to increase transparency on where new aid is going over time and to expand understanding of where and how country based progress has been achieved World Bank web site
