Hassan, Hussam Mahmoud, Bruce Ellingwood, 2023-03-16 Social institutions such as hospitals and schools are among the main pillars of community stability. A drop in the functionality of hospitals and schools is likely to have short term and long term effects on a community including a reduction in medical interventions an increase in unschooled children and population outmigration in search of essential social services. However comprehensive community resilience models that consider the role played by social institutions in community stability following natural disasters are scarce at the present time. This paper provides a literature review and critical appraisal of previous studies on the resilience of hospital and school systems and their impact on community well being The review encompasses existing resilience models for single hospitals and schools their role when connected with other hospitals and schools in a network their reliance on each other as interdependent systems and their role in community resilience and stability Different mitigation strategies and policies to enhance hospital and school systems resilience after extreme natural hazards are also summarized The paper concludes with a series of recommendations to improve current models for social institutions enhance the connection between existing hospital and school resilience models and community resilience frameworks and develop social stability indices that policymakers can use in preparing and mitigating future extreme events Methods in Community-Based Participatory Research for Health Barbara A.
