

Cleveland 20 Years On: What Have We Learned About Intervening in Child Sexual Abuse?

This is the first of two linked papers. It examines the main changes in approach to child sexual abuse that have occurred since the events in Cleveland 20 years ago. Comparison between estimated prevalence rates and registrations for sexual abuse suggests that we are aware of only the tip of the iceberg. It is argued that in many cases uncertainty may have to be accepted, and that protection may be better achieved through a protective parent than through the child protection system. Clinical examples of cases presenting to a specialist child and adolescent mental health service are given. It is argued that, although society is now more willing to recognise the existence of child sexual abuse and professionals are better at dealing with families, outcomes for this group of children are not much improved.

This paper marks the 20th anniversary of Cleveland and describes how my professional practice has developed in the ensuing years in order to accommodate those events and their consequences. Since the time of the Cleveland controversy, in which I was involved, I have continued to work as a clinical psychologist in a child and adolescent mental health service (CAMHS) team, specialising in child protection. Over the past 12 years I have seen over 500 children and young people who have presented to the team with signs and symptoms that have raised concern about possible sexual abuse.

There have been major changes in the context for child protection work, which affect the process of working clinically with child
