

Predicting limits in sports is a clumsy business. In 1904 young Brutus Hamilton, later to crash down what he thought would be "the ultimate" to which track and field athletes aspired, he lived to regret his forecasts. By 1960, but 2 of the 14 events he cited, the "limits" had shattered. And none stand today. Mindful of this, most sports scientists today refuse to speak on "limits." And somewhere there was even the with remarkable spring in his legs, dreaming, practicing, and working hard toward the day that might shock the sports world by making good the legend of Beamon.

For athlete will, of course, never run at the limit or jump with enough force to go any further. At some point man will reach his physical limit, according to Irvin Judd, a research professor at the University of Kentucky Medical School and self-styled "record physiologist," those limits have not yet been met in some events.

Track and field is among the best sports to use a performance, because it is measured against stopwatch or yardstick. Judd keeps graphs on record-breaking performances, plotting how much they fall below the record is broken and by how much surpassed. From the 1880's, when track and field marks were first recorded, until the early 1960's, lines on the graphs kept going up. But now, in events like the sprints, from 100 to 400 m, they are getting flat; world records are seldom broken if they are, it is by very little. To Judd, this says the limits have just about been reached.

Some sports, however, are less evolved than swimming records are being broken with great frequency, and female swimmers today are better than the times recorded by the best male swimmers years ago. Likewise, the performance graphs in women track and field athletes are still coming upward, showing that they too have not come near their maximum potential.

But are the athletes of the 1980's "better" than counterparts of 30 or 50 years ago, as one writer has said? The testimony of the tape or computer is supported by other evidence. First, there is a much larger population, which means the odds of more superior athletes. Moreover, people are faster and stronger than they were 50 years ago, because of better diet and modern medicine.

Sports has entered into the laboratory. Left: Stadium clock monitors the performance of a runner in this case. In place of a track position connected to a computer that stores, calculates, and displays on a video screen the precise time of her motion. Below: Judd of her medical. Below: Judd of her medical. Below: Judd of her medical.

Just as important is the leisure time now available for sports. In the past, getting a job or tending the farm was far more important than finding a college that granted athletic scholarships.

There are other reasons that athletic performance has improved. Sports has gone into the scientific laboratory—and technology has moved onto the playing fields. Within the last decade, enormous studies have been made in sports science and sports medicine. The former has given researchers an understanding of how athletes function; the latter has devised ways to keep them healthy while in a high-powered state. Better equipment with which to perform, along with new devices for analyzing training and competitive techniques, has given the modern athlete a distinct advantage over those of the past.

The small nation of East Germany has become a sporting power through the use of sports medicine and science. Their sports doctors and researchers trade information back and forth; their administrators plow money and time into bringing athletes to their full potential. With less than 17,000,000 people, East Germany has moved past the United States to become

Madison's Managers Anthony M. Bertelli, Laurence E. Lynn, 2006-05

Combining insights from traditional thought and practice and from contemporary political analysis Madison's Managers presents a constitutional theory of public administration in the United States. Anthony Michael Bertelli and Laurence E. Lynn Jr. contend that managerial responsibility in American government depends on official respect for the separation of powers and a commitment to judgment, balance, rationality, and accountability in managerial practice. The authors argue that public management administration by unelected officials of public agencies and activities based on authority delegated to them by policymakers derives from the principles of American constitutionalism articulated most clearly by James Madison. Public management, they argue, is a constitutional institution necessary to successful governance under the separation of powers. To support their argument, Bertelli and Lynn combine two intellectual traditions often regarded as antagonistic: modern political economy, which regards public administration as controlled through bargaining among the separate powers and organized interests; and traditional public administration, which emphasizes the responsible implementation of policies established by legislatures and elected executives while respecting the procedural and substantive rights enforced by the courts. These literatures are mutually reinforcing, the authors argue, because both feature the role of constitutional principles in public management. Madison's Managers challenges public management scholars and professionals to recognize that the legitimacy and future of public administration depend on its constitutional foundations and their specific implications for managerial practice.

Disconnected William Wresch, 1996 In the Information Age, information is power. Who produces all that information? How does it move around? Who uses it to what ends and under what constraints? Who gets that power? And what happens to the people who have no access to it? Disconnected begins with a striking vignette of two men. One is the thriving manager of a company selling personal computers and computer services. The other is just one among thousands of starving laborers. He has no way to find the information that might help him find a job; he cannot afford newspapers; rarely sees television; cannot understand the dialect of local radio broadcasts; will probably never touch a computer. These two men happen to live in Windhoek, Namibia, but this is not a story about Africa; it is a story that could be repeated almost anywhere in the world, even next door. With vivid anecdotes and data, William Wresch contrasts the opportunities of the information-rich with the limited prospects of the information-poor. Surveying the range of information—personal, public, organizational, commercial—that has become the currency of exchange in today's world, he shows how each represents a form of power. He analyzes the barriers that keep people information-poor: geography, tyranny, illiteracy, psychological blinders, noise, crime. Technology alone, he demonstrates, is not the answer. Even the technology-rich do not always get access to important information or recognize its value. Wresch spells out the grim consequences of information inequity for individuals and society. Yet he ends with reasons for optimism and stories of people who are working to pull down the impediments to the flow of information.
