International Cooperation In Research And Development:

International Cooperation in Research and Development, 2001 Developments in science and technology are increasingly the result of international collaboration Many indicators show increasing links among world scientists to conduct joint research share data conduct international meetings develop common standards and transfer technology Data suggest that this activity is not just increasing but is changing the conduct organization and outputs of scientific research around the world Scientific research is becoming more globalized increasing numbers of countries are building their scientific capabilities and participating in world science More collaborative a growing proportion of projects and the publications they produce result from collaborations by investigators from a mix of nations and more distributed scientific teams are collaborating across greater distances and involve more widely dispersed expertise International Cooperation in Research and Development Caroline S. Wagner, Allison Yezril, Scott Hassell, Science and Technology Policy Institute (Rand Corporation), 2001 Scientific research is becoming increasingly more globalized and more collaborative At the same time there is growing pressure within the United States to justify government funding for science and technology S T The potential conflict between these developments raises questions of whether U S investment in S T benefits U S taxpayers and whether investment in scientific capacity building overseas has created competition rather than mere assistance To understand the answers to these questions this report describes the scope and nature of U S spending on international cooperative research and development ICRD in fiscal year FY 1997 Most spending over 90 percent is for collaboration on common research problems among scientists from different countries Aerospace S T dominated spending with biomedical science a distant second This book finds that the federal government spent 4.4 billion on ICRD in FY 1997 an increase of 1.1 billion over FY 1995 However this figure may reflect better data collection and increased reporting rather than an actual increase in spending The only notable change in the two year period involves a substantial increase in cooperative activity with Russia tied heavily to space related projects International Cooperation in Research and Development Caroline S. Wagner, 1997 The United States spends considerable sums on international cooperation in research and development ICRD Policymakers have expressed concerns about these cooperative activities Some fear that the United States is paying more than its fair share of the work's cost Others worry that the country is giving away critical technologies to potential foreign competitors Additional concerns have been voiced that cooperative programs subordinate the interests of true science to strategic or political ends These claims are difficult to test however for a number of reasons the large number of projects the long timelines of projects and the focus on reporting research results not measuring larger benefits This report uses information from the RAND RaDiUS research and development R D database complemented by agency interviews to catalogue international cooperative R D and to construct a framework for assessing benefits the United States may derive from participation in such research Based on the framework of metrics developed for this project the author also presents a case study examining cooperation in earthquake sciences and seismology to test the ability of these metrics to provide feedback on benefits
