Antony Weymouth: The Gentlemen Adventurers William Henry Giles Kingston, 2020-09-28 What Ned Raymond ahoy Heave to lad What dost seek to give a wide berth to an old friend That once was not your wont Ned Raymond ahoy I say The slight dark moustache on the lip of the person addressed showed that he had just reached the age of manhood His raven hair hung in ringlets from his head A black velvet cloak thrown over one shoulder and a tightly fitting dress of the same material and hue set off his well made active figure His plumed cap and the sword by his side showed that he claimed to belong to the upper rank of society Indeed no one looking at the refined expression of his features and his intelligent countenance could doubt that such was his right He was walking somewhat rapidly through the narrow and irregularly built streets of the seaport town of Plymouth at that time one of the chief ports of departure for the numerous naval expeditions which went forth to the West and to the East in search of new lands and of regions of gold and diamonds and other precious stones It is worthy of remark that the people of Devonshire and Cornwall have from the earliest days shown a strong propensity for naval adventure This arises not alone from their geographical position but has descended to them from their progenitors who were there can be but little doubt Phoenicians or their descendants the Carthaginians perhaps sailors merchants and others attracted from the northern shores of Africa for the sake of the tin found in those counties Even at the present day many of their customs and the nautical terms they employed are retained The clotted cream of Devonshire and on the coast of Barbary is the same as is the mode in which the people manage their farms Caboose was the name of the temple carried by the fire worshipping Phoenicians on the decks of their vessels the cook's house on board ship is now so called Davit in Arabic is a crooked piece of wood the same term we apply to the timbers by which boats are hoisted up to the sides of ships However we are now talking of more modern days and must proceed
