The Husband's Message

From now on, don't let any living man hold you back from the journey or block your way. Set out and make for the sea, the gull's home, and board a ship so that over the seaway, southwards from here, you may find your man.

IV Rune-Riddle

Strangers coming in from the west saw a line of islands and sand dunes. Behind that was a low coastline where the earth seemed to be rolling into the water, a land of marshes and meres with ridges of sand back beyond.

Folk who were jealous of the Frisians' skill in ship-building and rowing, or who had come up against their stubborn courage in holding on to their gains, said that the Frisians spent so much time in their ships because they were drier there than in Frisia. They said that the Frisians laid to rest on top of their middens to get up out of the mud. They added that Frisians were born with webbed feet.

The men aboard the Saxon ship coming into the mouth of the Ems were not so like the one they had left behind, that landing was almost like home-coming. The king of the East Saxons wanted to marry the Frisian king's sister. He had sent precious gifts in the care of his youngest brother to show how much he valued the alliance. He had also sent two of his wisest counsellors to do the talking when the bargaining started.

The strangers had been watched since they came within sight of the Frisian coast. As they passed between two of the islands that lay across the mouth of the Ems, a warship rounded the point to their starboard and followed them up river. When they came into the haven, the coastguard was already waiting for them, with a large and well-armed band of warriors behind him.

Young Prince Sigwulf grinned approvingly.

'Nobody's likely to catch the Frisians off-guard!'

The counsellors, Lord Ealdhelm and Lord Hereberht, looked at each other behind his back but said nothing.

In answer to the coastguard's challenge, they named themselves and said they came in peace with a message for King Frecalaf. The coastguard let them land; he was polite but wary. He put watchmen aboard their ship, promising that it would be kept safe and seaworthy for them, but set out with most of his men to see them on their way inland towards the river-mouth. Prince Sigwulf glanced back towards the river. The Frisian warship was pulling away toward the islands at the river-mouth.
