

Chapter 1.1 Main economic groups and factors of production

Answers to case study

Case study, p. 9

- 1 Consumers of coffee include people buying coffee from shops, such as supermarkets, to consume at home and also in coffee shops to consume outside the home.
- 2 Producers here include coffee-bean farmers, international coffee traders, coffee manufacturers and coffee-shop businesses.
- 3 Examples of land include coffee plants, the soil where the plants are grown, the ground area where the coffee shop is built.

Examples of labour include farm labourers and coffee-shop sales assistants.

Examples of capital include harvesters, farm buildings and coffee shop premises.

Examples of enterprise include the work of the owner of the farm, trading company or coffee shop when taking the risks in the business and organising the other factors of production.

- 4 Increased VAT revenue: if consumers are buying more coffee and food from these coffee shops the government would receive more tax revenue from these sales. This tax revenue can then be used by the government to spend in other areas of the economy such as education. (Note: The amount of sales tax is likely to increase, whereas the case study mentions that the amount of tax some of the coffee-shop chains pay on their profits to the government is arguably too low.)

Decreased unemployment benefits: if jobs are created in these new coffee shops, there could be a reduction in the number of people unemployed. This means the government has to pay out fewer unemployment benefits.

Regeneration of city centres: if new coffee shops attract consumers into city centres again, then they may visit other shops and buy goods and services there as well. This could be another positive impact on city centres and lead to new growth in sales. This is known as regeneration. This benefits government in many ways, such as increased rents from firms renting local council properties, and increased tax revenue.

There could be increased costs for the government as well: the government may need to provide more rubbish and recycling options for items such as disposable coffee cups.
