Electronic Bulletin Boards:

Electronic Bulletin Boards and Computer Conferencing James Sanchez, 1987 Washington Online Bruce Maxwell, 1996 Changing Learning Culture with Electronic Bulletin Boards Roger Boyle, Jim Jackson, Rik Wade, University of Leeds. School of Computer Studies, 1995 Abstract A tool for accessing the popularly known Internet news has been adapted to support a modular degree scheme providing a bulletin board mechanism for electronic distribution of material and a forum for student feedback and debate We describe the setting up and maintenance of these boards We present data recording reader and writer activity on all these boards and note various unexpected features in both We also consider the distribution of traffic through a semester and tie it to particular events We analyse the traffic content and note repeated examples of peer support and cascaded learning together with contributions from staff not normally associated with delivery We also observe lengthy debates on general issues connected with syllabus content and general learning issues We conclude that the introduction of these boards has facilitated much more than efficient distribution of material and problem solving and has instead generated changes in the expectations and behaviour of learners and staff Electronic Bulletin Board System for the Federal Depository Library Program Marian W.
