Scott, 2006-02-02 This book focuses on the theme of the mutually constitutive relations between geographic space and the economic order Three principle lines of investigation are identified and explored First Allen J Scott sketches out the general theory of the division of labour and the ways in which it is reflected in geographic patterns of specialization and interaction He examines in particular the role of the division of labour in the formation of large scale agglomerations of economic activity and the ways in which their internal and external relationships are played out Second he considers the structure of geographic space as a fountainhead of creativity learning and innovation A theory of the creative field is presented and its application to the investigation of entrepreneurship technological change and the dynamics of the cultural economy is considered Third he offers an account of the regional question in less developed parts of the world Here he recovers some of the arguments of high development theory and shows how they can be revitalized in the light of a specifically geographic approach These three lines of investigation are of course tightly intertwined with one another The argument in general demonstrates that geographic space is not just an inert dimension in which the economy unfolds but plays an active role in the eventuation of economic outcomes This state of affairs raises many difficult policy questions about growth and development in both more and less economically advanced countries Some of the more important of these questions are also broached in the book emphasise the fact that technological change and innovation adoption takes place on a wider scale and in a greater number of forms than is frequently assumed The unusual case studies such as the Kenyan food processing sector furniture making in Nicaragua and tile manufacturing in Indonesia highlight the patterns of innovation adoption and diffusion and serve as a unique and fascinating backdrop to the study The authors pay specific attention to innovation by small enterprises in times of economic crisis and go on to assess the mechanisms employed to promote innovation They demonstrate that although radical innovation among small enterprises occurs on a limited scale innovation through gradual incremental improvements in production processes and products is continuous Innovation and Small Enterprises in the Third World will be widely read by academics researchers and policymakers concerned with innovation adoption and diffusion and third world development issues
