

Location Theory

Alfred Weber

- Location Theory – predicting where a business will or should be located.
- Location of an industry is dependent on economic, political, cultural features as well as whim.
- Location Theory Considers:
 - Variable costs-energy, transportation costs & labor costs
 - Friction of distance-increasing distance =increased time & cost

Location Models

Weber's Model-The Least Cost Theory

Alfred Weber, (1868-1958) a German economists, published Theory of the Location of Industries in 1909. His theory was the industrial equivalent of the Von Thunen Model.

Manufacturing plants will locate where costs are the least.

Categories of Costs:

Transportation-the most important cost-usually the best site is where cost to transport raw material and finished product is the lowest

Labor-high labor costs reduce profit-location where there is a supply of cheap, non-union labor may offset transportation costs

Agglomeration-when a group of industries cluster for mutual benefit

Mathematical Location and Land Use Theory Professor Dr. Tõnu Puu, 2013-03-09 In his student years the author of this book was fortunate to have Tord Palander once the leading location theorist of his age as teacher and later as his thesis adviser Palander started his economics career in the 30es with taking interest in spatial economics and ended up with monetary economics in the 50es The author made the reverse route So in the intersection of our professional lives Palander and I both worked with monetary issues and we never spoke of spatial economics in his remaining lifetime Despite this the author assimilated Palander's basic philosophy which perspired already through his dissertation Beitriige zur Standortstheorie Good science is there to be easily understood the difficult and mysterious being under the constant suspicion of being wrong Also it was when trying to organize Palander's scientific remains upon his death in 1972 that the author found two small papers by Martin Beckmann from the early 50es These concise contributions largely overlooked which did cast the entire spatial trade equilibrium in terms of two partial differential equations became the focus of interest of the author for many years It was however at first hard to get ahead with the Beckmann model just because it was so general It could subsume most of the models ever developed in spatial economics but due to this very generality it was difficult to get out any particular information except in terms of examples
