Future Of Arms Control:

The Future of Arms Control Michael A. Levi, Michael E. O'Hanlon, 2004-12-07 Arms control for decades at the core of the foreign policy consensus today is among the more contentious issues in American politics. It is pilloried and considered out of mode in many conservative quarters while being viewed as nearly sacrosanct in many liberal circles. In this new book Michael Levi and Michael O'Hanlon argue that neither the left nor the right has a correct view of the proper utility of arms control in the age of terror. Arms control in the traditional sense—lengthy treaties to limit nuclear and other military competitions among the great powers—is no longer particularly useful. Nor should arms control be pursued as a means to the end of constraining the power of nations or of promoting global government. It is still a critical tool though for controlling dangerous technologies, particularly those that in the hands of hostile states or terrorist organizations could cause massive death and destruction. Arms control and coercive action, including military force, must be integrated into an overall strategy for preventing proliferation now more than ever before. Arms control should be used to gain earlier warning of illicit activities inside dangerous states, allowing the international community to take coercive action in a timely way. The authors propose three new criteria to guide future arms control efforts designed to respond to today's geopolitical realities. Arms control must focus on the dangers of catastrophic technology, not so much in the hands of major powers as of small states and terrorist groups. Their criteria lead to a natural focus on nuclear and biological technologies. Much tougher measures to prevent countries from gaining nuclear weapons technology while purportedly complying with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and procedures for controlling dangerous biological technologies will be most prominent in this framework, while lower priority is given to efforts such as bilateral nuclear accords and most treaties.

The Future of Arms Control, 1999 It is no exaggeration to suggest that of all the weapons created by man, none has created as much controversy as nuclear weapons. This is made all the more remarkable by the extremely brief combat history of these weapons with the last use of a nuclear device in war a mere three days after the first. The unique character of these weapons was recognized early in the nuclear era when a consensus emerged that nuclear weapons were somehow qualitatively different and would be governed by a unique set of rules. As a result of this qualitative difference and although the value of nuclear weapons as the ultimate deterrent was soon recognized and the arsenals of the United States and the USSR mushroomed during the Cold War, a corollary belief developed that these weapons must somehow be controlled. Thus the now familiar Cold War dynamic of an arms race and an arms control process was created, a dynamic that remains largely relevant today nearly a decade after the dissolution of the Soviet Union. The purpose of this paper is to assess the current state of things nuclear to include an examination of where the nation is headed in the field of strategic nuclear arms control. The author suggests a set of principles for arms control that are intended to function as signposts as the United States and Russia chart a course down a path that has never before been traveled, the path toward lower levels of nuclear weapons.
