

The Deadly Four

Plants make chemicals that can be valuable nutrients, powerful medicines, or deadly poisons. Many plants can make you sick, but these four are the most lethal near Seldovia. Learn them well!

Poison Water Hemlock

Cicuta douglasii and C. virosa

Part of the carrot family, poison water hemlock usually grows in standing water. It is the most deadly plant in North America and a big killer of livestock. Children have been poisoned by making whistles from the hollow stems. All parts of the plant are toxic, and it may hybridize with wild celery (Angelica species). Learn to identify plants well before harvesting them for food!

Baneberry

Actaea rubra

Opaque red or white berries bristle from an upright stalk, each with a black dot on one end and a crease down the side. Baneberries are noisily bitter, but poisonings can occur when berry pickers accidentally mix them with high-bush cranberries (Viburnum edule). As few as two berries may be fatal to a child. They are harmless to birds, which disperse their seeds.

Monkshood

Aconitum delphinifolium

From the hood-shaped purple flowers to the tips of the roots, this plant is both beautiful and perilous. Monkshood poison was used by the Aleutian Island Natives to hunt whales, paralyzing them with poisoned harpoon tips and causing them to drown. Common in meadows, monkshood contains a potent neurotoxin called aconite that can cause death within hours. It can also be absorbed through the skin, so avoid picking these flowers!

False Hellebore

Veratrum viride

Recognize false hellebore by its large, deeply-ribbed leaves. A distinctive plant that can be over three feet tall when full-grown, its young shoots can sometimes be confused with the tasty shoots of watermelon berry (Saxifraga oppositifolia). False hellebore has paired leaves and is always green, while watermelon berry has alternating leaves and a stem which may be pinkish with spots.
