

Why Immigration Should Be Controlled - Argumentative Essay

Introduction

The movement nature of human beings continues to make them travel from different parts of the world despite specific barriers. The desire to adventure and explore different countries makes immigration inevitable with many citizens. Immigration, therefore, can be construed as the habit of movement on the international scale from one nation to another. However, a debate is emerging as to whether immigration should be controlled or otherwise. Certain countries like America look at immigration policy keenly in the wake of global terror and insecurity.

Nevertheless, the decision to control or not immigration should be informed by the reasons as to why people travel to other foreign countries. Historically, people moved different parts of the world to search for educational, job, health and recreational opportunities among other factors. However, continued negativity emerging from the abuse of immigrants in certain parts of the world explains why immigration should be controlled. It is on this background that this paper argues as to whether immigration should or not be controlled.

Even though cultural integration remains critical for societal development, the specific negative behavior may emanate from immigrants. The interactive nature of people would necessitate sharing of values which can portend a misfortune to the host country. Some cultures ideally remain backward and outdated to the extent that their continued existence and practice leads to underdevelopment despite the much-needed progress (Carens 51). Most immigrants from underdeveloped countries often practice a conservative-like culture which hinders active and critical thinking. Therefore, immigration should get controlled through various strategies that ensure sieving of individuals that enter a country. For instance, a country can develop immigration questions that aim at testing attitude and peoples' worldview before gaining entry.

Historically, the benefits of immigration remain lauded despite negative effects that it created in some nations. Some people secured jobs and education through movement to other states as opposed to their native countries (Porter n.p). Nevertheless, research suggests that immigration can cause serious harm to both the countries donating and receiving the immigrants. For instance, a donating country that is giving away a highly skilled individual may leave his or her nation without deserved professionals and leaders to champion developmental agendas in such jurisdictions. Similarly, the receiving nation can suffer job loss particularly in scenarios where it receives skilled workforce from a foreign state. The lowly skilled workers may lose their employment due to mass entry into the job markets despite continued shrinking of job avenues (Tichenor 165). It is on this premise that it would inform a reasoned consideration to control immigration.

Health remains a fundamental aspect of humanity and should get enjoyed by all without any hitch whatsoever. Some countries due to their developed nature possess state of the art health facilities that capably handle all kinds of infections and illnesses. Controlled immigration would negatively deny many patients across the world the opportunity of accessing medical interventions from the facilities of their preference. However, the same health concerns strongly suggest that immigration should get controlled. It can only get rational and considerable if one strives to prevent a disease
