The promise of qualitative methods for organizational analysis lies in the potential for "thick" description and explanation of organizational processes. Such is the case with Nord and Tucker's examination of the implementation of NOW accounts in commercial banks (a routine innovation) and in savings and loan institutions (a radical innovation). The demands of good qualitative analysis are large and labor intensive: multi-site efforts increase the difficulties in reducing voluminous field notes and documentary evidence into a tractable, yet accurate synthesis of events. Nord and Tucker tackle their tasks with enthusiasm for richness and concern for systematic and unambiguous treatment.

The book is organized into three major sections. Section one (ch. 1-2) reviews innovation and organizational literature relevant to implementation, identifies the origins of the sensitizing concepts used to focus data analysis, and presents the methods employed in the study. This section provides insight into the author's rationale and strategy for data reduction.

Section two (ch. 3-11) contains the case studies. Here, the unveiling of diverse experiences prepares us for what Nord and Tucker conclude is the organizational-specific nature of innovation. We are introduced to organizations with historically different capacities for innovation. These differences result in a variety of reasons for innovating, strategies for managing the process, and levels of performance. Although the plethora of detail is sometimes overwhelming, a summary table synthesizing the case evidence helps the reader keep on track.

In the final section, Nord and Tucker argue that the innovation process they observed is both multifinal (ch. 12 - similar processes with dissimilar ends) and equifinal (ch. 13 - dissimilar processes with similar ends). The highly complex case material makes such a conclusion inevitable, but this judgment arises out of a well-reasoned presentation of the evidence. And, though the implementation process was found to be largely organization-specific, the authors do uncover some commonalities among the successfully implementing organizations.

The final chapter of this book is the most interesting and the most disappointing for students of the innovation process — interesting because here Nord and Tucker begin to relate their findings to the study of innovation, disappointing because their treatment is rather thin. Indeed, some of the case material might have been sacrificed for more discussion of the implications of their study for existing theory and research on innovation. They call for modifications to the ambidextrous and stage models of innovation and for greater specification and precision in our construct definition. They agree with Downs and Mohr that innovation is not a unique process for organizations and does not require special theories. And they suggest researchers shift their focus from central tendency approaches emphasizing organization-level activity to innovation as a set of subtasks (each with separate organizational requirements) in order to fulfill Tornatzky and Klein's
