and corrupted Vaca argues that evangelicalism is an expressly commercial religion Although religious traditions seem to incorporate people who embrace distinct theological ideas and beliefs Vaca shows members of contemporary consumer society often participate in religious cultures by engaging commercial products and corporations By examining the history of companies and corporate conglomerates that have produced and distributed best selling religious books bibles and more Vaca not only illustrates how evangelical ideas identities and alliances have developed through commercial activity but also reveals how the production of evangelical identity became a component of modern capitalism
