Arthritis H. Deicher, L. C. Schulz, 2012-12-06 Rheumatoid arthritis is a common disease an estimated 1 5% of the population being under medical treatment for it in European countries and elsewhere However to date the origin of this chronic inflammatory disorder has not been elucidated Evidence for the involvement of microbial agents is still tenuous the reason for the defective control of inflammation is still unknown and the disease all too often progresses to crippling stages despite long term treatment As T McKeown recently stated with regard to rheumatoid arthritis not enough is even known to indicate which is the more promising approach and the prudent course is to investigate both origins and mechanisms While working on animal model diseases as well as on aspects of rheumatoid arthritis and related disorders in man the members of the Special Research Area on pathophysiology of rheumatoid inflammation in man and animals Sonderforschungsbereich 54 Pathomechanismen der rheumatoiden Entzündung bei Mensch und Tier maintained by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft at the Veterinary and Medical Schools Hannover have been guided by the concept that by studying clinically and morphologically similar diseases in several species mutually stimulating results might lead to improved knowledge of the pathophysiology of rheumatoid arthritis In particular from working with model diseases in animals new approaches to the etiology of rheumatoid arthritis might be derived while detailed knowledge of pathogenetic processes in rheumatoid arthritis could further research in chronic stages of pertinent animal diseases
