

on the preliminary data from AEC and are not to be construed as final conceptual designs. The shielded sealed storage-cask concept (SSCC—Shielded), the air-cooled vault concept (ACVC), and the water basin concept with overpack (WBC-OP) were deemed to be the best alternatives and are compared in detail in the following sections. The remaining three concepts (i.e., concepts 2, 3, and 5 above, described in Appendices B, C, and D) are variants of the SSCC—Shielded and WBC-OP and are not considered further in this report.

According to current design, solidified waste will be packaged in a standard stainless steel canister of about 12-inch (30-cm) inside diameter that is 10 feet (3 m) long and contains 6.3 cubic feet (0.18 m³) of waste from reprocessing 3.15 metric tons of fuel and generating approximately 3.25 kilowatts of decay heat at 10 years of age. (Actually, a decay heat of 5 kW per canister was used as a design basis.) The radioactive waste in each canister results from the generation of approximately 800 million kilowatt hours of electricity.

Table 4 is a condensed schedule of waste delivery and of attendant cumulative decay heat. The estimated 75,000 standard canisters will accommodate approximately all the high-level wastes expected to be produced in the United States by the year 2000. The last waste shipment to the RSSF will take place within 10 years of its generation, or by 2010. The RSSF is to be designed for up to 100 years of storage with continued surveillance and monitoring. After providing for the initial receiving and handling facilities by around 1981, a modular construction program is anticipated to allow postponement of capital expenditures until added storage facilities are required.

The SSCC—Shielded is the forerunner of the SSCC considered in detail in this section. While both designs provide sufficient shielding to permit access to the storage area, the thick-wall design [14-in. (36-cm) thick wall and an 11-in. (28-cm) thick concrete sleeve] was deemed to be
