History of Canadian Wealth, Vol. 1 (Classic Reprint) Gustavus Myers, 2016-09-10 Excerpt from History of Canadian Wealth Vol 1. The rapid concentration of wealth in Canada is no mere fancy. Already it is estimated less than fifty men control or more than one third of Canada's material wealth as expressed in railways, banks, factories, mines, land, and other properties and resources. To say that this small group of individuals control so vast a wealth and the agencies of its production does not imply that they own it all. Between ownership and control there is a difference yet the reverse of that commonly supposed. By means of their control of financial markets and distributive systems a small number of men may effectively control sources of wealth which still may remain under individual ownership as witness the case of the farms of which control farmers throughout Canada are bitterly complaining. Also it is not necessary for magnates to own all of the stock of railroads, banks, factories, and mines; much of that ownership may be distributed among small shareholders yet by their predominantly large holdings of stock and through their power of directorship those magnates can and do control those diversified and often financially interconnected sources of wealth.
