Lecture 1 Introduction to pharmacokinetics

In the upcoming weeks we look at conventional drugs. Dose effective relationship is usually predictable. Also these drugs are mostly very small.

Property	Conventional drug	Biopharmaceutical
Size	Generally <500-kDa ( $10^{-2}$ )	Generally >500-kDa ( $10^{-2}$ ), e.g. oligonucleotides, $10^{-3}$ ; small proteins, $10^{-2}$ – $10^{-4}$ ; mAbs, $50^{-2}$ ; genes > $10^{-5}$
Synthesis	Easy to synthesise identical batches	Most biopharmaceuticals are unique (except small peptides and short oligonucleotides which can be synthesised chemically)
Relationship between dose and effect	Usually a predictable relationship between dose and effect	Complex mechanisms of action, usually high-affinity binding, slow on- and off-rates, unusual shaped D/R curves
Pharmacokinetics	Often oral administration, variable absorption and bioavailability, phase 1 and phase 2 metabolism, excretion of drug in urine or faeces	Usually parenteral administration, bioavailability high, long half-life, atypical biodistribution and removal mechanisms
Toxicology and adverse effects	Variable, possible drug interactions	Immunogenicity, few drug interactions, generally fewer adverse effects
	Small molecules, Chemical entities

Pharmacokinetics is the study of the fate of a drug inside the body. What does the body do with the drug. This includes the processes of ADME. Absorption Distribution Metabolism and Elimination.

Drug is removed from the circulation but also a compound of the drug could go back to the circulation. In the vena porta a drug could be broke down. Only the part that is not broken down goes to the circulation and to the tissues. After that there is some renal clearance and hepatic clearance.
