The cultural and dialectal differences as they currently exist in rural and inner-city poverty areas are the primary focus of this volume. The text contains the conclusions from the authors' research studies involving several hundred children of various racial and ethnic backgrounds along with numerous examples of children's oral response to school English. A discussion of how language develops and dialects are learned, techniques for diagnosing elementary school age children's stage of language development, and instructional strategies to facilitate children's oral language and reading development round out this engaging volume.
