Degelman, 2015-06-15 Excerpt from Essentials of Psychology Psychology is that section of philosophy which considers the soul The soul in its most general sense denotes that which makes a being live it is the first principle of life in a living being If we regard only the etymology of the word the object of psychology should be co extensive with all living beings vegetable and animal as well as man Custom however has restricted it at the present day so that psychology is generally limited to the study of man Accepting this restriction we know from the direct testimony of consciousness that man who is a living sentient and rational being is one being It is the man who feels and thinks not his soul only just as it is the man and not his body only that works when his hands are in motion Hence we must consider the complete human nature as the seat of life sensation and thought and look upon the soul as the first principle in virtue of which we are alive sentient and capable of rational thought To include all living beings we may define psychology as the science of the vital principle which intrinsically constitutes living beings The proper object of psychology then is the vital principle inasmuch as it is the constituent part of the organized body and we may be warranted in extending our study to the various forms of life organic life sentient life and
