scale experiments revealed high heat- and mass-transfer capabilities, making it possible to control very demanding chemistries [5, 6]. To run a reaction under kinetic control, the characteristic time for transfer must be much lower than the characteristic time of the reaction. This characteristic time for transfer scales with the square of the transfer distance. Ten times shorter distance results in a hundred times faster transfer.

Nature already applied this basic principle long ago when pulmonary vesicles and capillary veins evolved to enable the rise of multicellular organisms. The drive for intensification of transfer capabilities in reactor engineering led to reinvention of the conventional tube reactor. Innovative manufacturing technologies made it possible to etch reaction channels in glass chips with diameters in the micrometer domain. Although small in size, these microreactors provided the processing conditions to reach a thousand-fold increase in productivity.

Dynamics of innovation

Despite its widespread success in the laboratory, there are just a few reported microreactor applications on industrial scale. In our opinion, the reason for this should not be attributed to the unwillingness of industry to adopt to new technology, as is often suggested. For a better understanding, we must take a closer look at the dynamics of innovation and the factors that influence it.

In the mid 1990s, Møller [7] presented a theory of technological change (innovation) based upon evolutionary principles. Technologies can be seen as species in a habitat. They emerge, survive and reproduce or become extinct. As in biology, there are selective forces at work through which technologies compete with each other. The selection criteria come from success in the market, such as favorable economics, robustness, better satisfying the needs, or even fulfilling unmet needs (niches). To earn their foothold in the habitat and survive, emerging technologies must out-compete conventional technologies. Take for example the hardware revolutions in television sets when color broadcasting or flat-panel technologies were introduced. Plasma displays came first on the market, followed soon by liquid-crystal (LCD) and light-emitting-diode (LED) displays. Although more expensive than cathode-ray-tube (CRT) based technology, emerging devices got a foothold. Finally, CRT and plasma lost this struggle for survival, and LED-based screens became the dominant species.

Further, Møller's theory differentiates between the technical know-how and the expression of it into the artifact (product). The expression is the ability to turn blueprints into reality, which requires complementary factors, such as skilled craftsmen, manufacturing technology and high-quality materials. Lack of these complementary factors can cause an incubation period between the moment the invention was made and the start of commercial success. As an example, we can look at the development of the light bulb. The basic principle that a

Advanced Non-Intrusive Ultrasonic Flow Measurement

- Highly accurate and reliable bidirectional flow measurement of liquids and gases over a wide turndown ratio
- Bidirectional communication via all common field buses as well as advanced remote diagnostics
- Engineered and approved for use in hazardous areas (ATEX, IECEx Zone 2) and at extreme pipe temperatures (-170 °C up to 400 °C)
- Highest cost-effectiveness:
 - No pipe works
 - No process shut-downs
 - Virtually maintenance-free
- Zero point stable, drift-free and independent of pipe dimensions, material, pressurization, pipe noise and the medium flowing inside (calibration traceable to national standards)
