

* At the federal level, at present, the supportive role of the Office of Education in assisting educational technology to become a coherent, scientifically-based field is too tentative and weak and has been marked by more failures than successes. A higher degree of professionalism is needed in the management of government programs. Congress for its part, has not been persuaded by the USOE or other advocates of educational technology that it does have a greater contribution to make in strengthening the federal role.

* There is considerable danger that budgetary restrictions will undermine the staging of meaningful demonstrations to adequately test educational technology in both an economic and educational sense.

* Not enough attention has been given to the importance of research findings which have been interpreted to conclude that students taught by television, the computer, and other media demonstrate no significant difference in achievement than control groups taught by a teacher. Some authorities have challenged the validity of these experiments. But nonetheless no-significant-difference findings do raise important questions for state and regional policy makers as to whether technology can be applied to achieve lesser costs, greater individualization and diversity of schooling--particularly in the creation of new "open" educational systems to reach learners outside the formal educational system.

* Presently, in excess of $1 billion a year is being spent by educational institutions on various types of instructional media involving
