

BETWEEN THE BATTLES AT THE FRONT HOW OUR MEN CARRY ON

By night the battle zone is a scene of great activity, but during the daytime no movement may be discerned. Indeed even the shell-ploughed land stand the rusted houses and remnants of once charming little villages. Here a heap of blackened ruins marks the grave of a glorious church, there a destruction of broken walls and charred wood is all that remains to show the site of a sometime prosperous and happy townland. Stretching across the country in irregular lines, forming a mass of tangled curves, are the opposing trench systems, clearly indicated by their white sand-bagged parapets. Closer to the wall the staccato top-top of a machine-gun, the stack of a sniper's rifle, or the deeper imperative note from heavier ordnance, yet neither infantryman nor gunner may be seen to indicate the position of the innumerable regiments and batteries whose home is in the battle zone. Apparently— with the exception of intermittent fire—there is nothing doing. In truth, everything is doing.

The purpose of this article is to lift the veil for a moment and to give the reader a brief glimpse of the varied routine of day life in trench town as the author knows it. Just before dawn patrols and working-parties return from No Man's Land of the rest to their respective trenches, where they find their comrades, each stationed at his post with loaded rifle and bayonet fixed. One hour is now down every available man of a trench party must stand to arms, each remaining at his post until the coming of daylight makes a surprise attack by the enemy an impossibility, often the remaining patrols being, with them a few prisoners—members of an enemy patrol in the rear. Often, owing to heavy shelling of the communication trenches, rations and water cannot be brought up to the firing line, when the men may be compelled to fall back on their emergency iron rations—usually beef and biscuits—obtaining water, perhaps, from some old pump in the courtyard of a ruined house near the trench, or, failing this, a hole dug in the trench floor.

Forts are lined in trenches, which are made from old hachets, biscuit tins or petrol tins in which holes are thrust with the bayonet, the necessary wood being brought up to the trench by the men from their previous rest billets. Easy articles of make do come from the trenches soon show that breakfast is in preparation. Breakfast over, the "languor" of the day commences. Work between the trenches can be done only under cover of darkness, but much remains to be done in the trench itself, where the workers are under cover. Perhaps the trench is a new one—then it must be deepened, sand boards must be laid down, the walls must be supported by wooden revetment, and posts and ammunition stores must be built, dug-outs for the men must be erected.

Of interest here may be a brief sketch of the growth of a trench from the first shallow rifle-pit dug by the men under fire to the completed fortification, with its detailed defence and outworks, its head-cover, drains, pumps, etc. Let us imagine a case in which, after the assault, the enemy first line has been captured, but not the second line, and that the attacking general desires to dig in at the furthestmost point of his advance, using the enemy first line as his new second line. The firing line of the attacking infantry is lying in open order under fire. Each man with his entrenching tools scurries up sufficient earth as best he may to fill the two sandbags carried as part of his equipment during an attack. These filled, he uses as head-cover and continues scooping until he has formed a rough sloping bank, in which he lies. Meanwhile, from the captured enemy first line his comrades hold back the enemy

Post-World War II Masculinities in British and American Literature and Culture Stefan Horlacher, Kevin Floyd, 2016-04-08 Analyzing literary texts plays films and photographs within a transatlantic framework this volume explores the inseparable and mutually influential relationship between different forms of national identity in Great Britain and the United States and the construction of masculinity in each country The contributors take up issues related to how certain kinds of nationally specific masculine identifications are produced how these change over time and how literature and other forms of cultural representation eventually question and deconstruct their own myths of masculinity Focusing on the period from the end of World War II to the 1980s the essays each take up a topic with particular cultural and historical resonance whether it is hypermasculinity in early cold war films the articulation of male anxieties in plays by Arthur Miller David Mamet and Sam Shepard the evolution of photographic depictions of masculinity from the 1960s to the 1980s or the representations of masculinity in the fiction of American and British writers such as Patricia Highsmith Richard Yates John Braine Martin Amis Evan S Connell James Dickey John Berger Philip Roth Frank Chin and Maxine Hong Kingston The editors and contributors make a case for the importance of understanding the larger context for the emergence of more pluralistic culturally differentiated and ultimately transnational masculinities arguing that it is possible to conceptualize and emphasize difference and commonality simultaneously
