ANN WEATHERALL, MARIA STUBBE,
JANE SUNDERLAND AND JUDITH BAXTER

Introduction Ann Weatherall and Maria Stubbe

This chapter reports on a symposium at the Fifth International Gender and Language Association (IGALA5) Conference held in Wellington, New Zealand in July 2008¹. This symposium brought together feminist researchers from a variety of methodological perspectives with the aim of generating a more nuanced understanding of the contributions of different approaches to the study of language and gender, in particular, feminist methodologies emerging out of the traditions of conversation analysis and critical discourse analysis. These were selected as the focus for the symposium because of the emergence of feminist conversation analysis and interactional research alongside critical discourse analysis in the gender and language field. An issue to be addressed is whether it is possible to combine a fine-grained analysis of language in interaction with a critical politics that seeks to disrupt enduring patterns of social inequality.

Members of the panel were invited to consider a particular data excerpt from the perspective of conversation analysis (CA) and three other critical methodologies commonly used by feminist language researchers, namely critical discourse analysis (CDA), post-structuralist discourse analysis (PDA) and sociocultural linguistics/interactional sociolinguistics (IS), in order to facilitate an explicit comparison of these approaches.² A New Zealand talkback radio call in which a gender and sexuality issue was topical provided the empirical focus for the session.
