Four Essential Pillars of Human Development

Equity

Equity is a powerful concept that lies at the heart of the human development paradigm. Equity must be understood in terms of the opportunities, not necessities or needs. A commitment to equity means, for people and nations alike, access to basic services and quality opportunities, allowing equity to serve as a foundation toward a sustainable enhancing of lives.

Sustainability

Central to the concept of sustainability is the notion of development today, of doing development practices across sectors and future generations and ensuring environmental and intergenerational equity. In terms of sustainability, it is the understanding of all forms of capital—human, social, financial and environmental—that must lie at the core of human development practice, with that to achieve an equitable life opportunity and human development.

Accountability

Accountability is another essential component of the human development paradigm. It focuses on human capital-based development models where good practice may be a source of development, particularly in poor and poor of the human development paradigm, with human capital-based practice to the other components of human development. Human capital is therefore a core of the human development model – an essential part for the human practice.

Engagement

Human development practice through full engagement of the people at all levels – local, national and global, ensuring that people are in a position to participate in the development of their own lives and, in return, to the human development model is generally viewed as essential. The human development paradigm includes participation, social capital, economic and political. Consequently, the human capital-based practice is a core of the human development model.
