Human Hormones:

Human Pituitary Hormones E. van Cauter, G. Copinschi, 2012-12-06 During the last decade circadian and episodic fluctuations of the plasma levels of pituitary hormones have been demonstrated in man. The interest in the time dependence of the pituitary secretions partially originates from their close functional relation with the neuroendocrine mechanisms presumably responsible for the control of the circadian rhythmicity in man. High frequency blood sampling techniques and specific radio immunoassays have allowed to describe in detail the variations over the 24 h cycle of the hormonal concentrations in healthy individuals under basal conditions as well as after manipulation of external synchronizers such as the sleep wake cycle, the dark light cycle and the feeding schedule. Alterations in normal hormonal variations have been suggested to play a role in the etiopathogeny of several metabolic and mental diseases such as obesity or manic depression. Important clinical implications regarding treatment and prevention are expected to be developed in the near future. However, so far data obtained in different groups are difficult to compare because different hormones were studied using different protocols and statistical methods. As a result unclear or controversial issues are not uncommon.
