

FOR A MORE TRANSPARENT AND ACCOUNTABLE MINING SECTOR

ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENTS

Before a mining company is given an approval to mine, it must conduct a thorough assessment of the environmental and social impact its mining operations might cause. The environmental impact statement produced by this assessment is crucial for government decision-making. But how accurate are these statements? Who writes them and how are they verified?

An environmental impact statement (EIS) is a document that outlines the social, economic and environmental impacts of an activity such as mining. The EIS is crucial for governments looking to make informed decisions about whether or not to give a mining project the green light. It forms the basis of any protections (or conditions) designed to reduce negative impacts on the environment and communities. It is also a vitally important process for communities as it is often the only way they can gain an understanding of what will happen on or near their land and the potential impacts of those activities.

Environmental, social, cultural and economic risks arise if the individuals responsible for the EIS do not have the appropriate experience and qualifications to conduct a robust assessment. Risks are higher if no one is independently verifying the models, systems and data used to produce the technical reports within an EIS. These elements can create the potential for unethical conduct to occur and heightens the risk of:

- environmental and social impacts not being effectively assessed,
- approval conditions being based on incorrect assessments, and
- management plans not adequately mitigating or rehabilitating negative impacts.

Accountability within the environmental impact assessment process can be increased and risks reduced through:

- ensuring that environmental impact assessors have the appropriate qualifications and experience to conduct the assessments (see our Guide to Stronger Environmental Impact Statements to learn more about how a certification requirement can achieve this),
- independent verification of modelling systems and technical reports for high-risk impacts, and
- increasing the transparency of the environmental impact assessment process to the public (see our EIS process map to learn about the process for large mining projects in Queensland).
