Abstract. This study examined the influence of culture on the perceived costs and benefits of learning. In a cross-cultural comparison between German and Greek students, we found that the German students perceived more costs and less benefits than the Greek students did. These differences were mediated by the students' self-esteem and their locus of control. The results are discussed in terms of the relationship between culture and learning.

Keywords: culture, learning, costs, benefits, self-esteem, locus of control

Introduction Learning is a process that requires time, effort, and money. Therefore, it is important to understand what motivates people to learn and what factors influence the perceived costs and benefits of learning.
