Finding the Perfect Match

Better tools for a better therapeutic connection

When seeking mental health care, your employees may encounter a variety of barriers to finding the right provider. But the quest to find care doesn't end with scheduling a first appointment. Not only do employees need to find a provider who can meet their clinical needs, but they may also need to find one who shares an identity or lived experience—including race, cultural background, or sexual orientation—so they feel safe to share.

Establishing a relationship based on understanding, safety, and comfort is called therapeutic alliance, and it's a crucial aspect of treatment. A large part of therapeutic alliance comes from finding a provider who understands the person's identity and experiences so they can focus on their recovery rather than explaining themselves and their background. Research has shown that, when people are of the same race or ethnicity as their provider, they are more likely to stay engaged in treatment.

When people don't feel that their provider fully grasps their needs or perspectives, they may initiate care and then drop out. Some may search for a new provider they believe will better understand them and offer more effective help, while others lose hope and discontinue therapy. This process not only extends the time needed for recovery but also increases costs for employers.

We thought it was really important that an employee had the power of choice—that they could pick a provider from a strong network that would truly connect with them or with their families.
