

Fireflies

Have you ever been out on a warm summer night and seen tiny twinkles of light around you in the air? Those are the flashes of a firefly.

Fireflies, or lightning bugs as they are sometimes known, glow like lightning. However, their flashes have nothing to do with the weather. The flashes are actually used to attract a mate. Fireflies use their glowing bellies to communicate with each other. Each firefly has its own distinct flash that it uses to find a mate. There are many kinds of fireflies. Some flash rapidly and frequently, and some shine for long periods.

A firefly isn't actually a fly. It's a beetle. It has wings, a protective shell to protect its wings called a wing case, and six legs. Fireflies like humid, warm habitats. Female fireflies lay their eggs in the ground. Incredibly, even the eggs glow! The eggs hatch in around a month, and then tiny firefly larvae emerge. These larvae are small, soft-bodied creatures with tiny legs. They like to feast on earthworms, snails, and slugs. It is understood that larvae live for up to two years while feeding and developing.

The skin of the larva does not grow, so when it gets too big it sheds the old layer, underneath is a new layer of skin.

The next step is for the larva to dig a hole in the ground and remain there while the body creates a hard outer shell to cover its body. This is called a pupa.

After several days, the fully grown adult firefly breaks free from the hard and crawls from the ground. It can live for up to one month. The firefly will try to find a mate during this period in order for the life cycle to start all over again.
