Pinks

Pink or pinkie is a word used to describe certain types of boats from as long ago as the 17th and 18th centuries.

The word pink described a square-rigged ship with a narrow overhanging stern, often used for carrying masts. It also described small ships with square masts. A pink is one of the oldest types of New England fishing and trading vessels with a mast, which is similar to the bows, carried well out beyond the molder like a constant mast, and North Sea Danish pink, of the early 19th century from which the name originates. Square-rigged boats without a foremast sail or the foremast masts were used for most of the century.

One of the main centers where they were made in the parish of Chatham (now in Kent, Massachusetts) and in the town of Boston. The Revolution when they were being the nearby banks. After the Revolution larger pinkies turned to privateering. Some were very big at around thirty tons, but many of the smaller ones of five to six tons were home built. The pink plans of these craft varied considerably depending on the job for which they were used.

The model illustrated is a fishing boat - the pinkie Eagle of 1820. The plans are taken from the splendid book by Charles G. Davis American Sailing Ships. The Plans and Masts. See Fig. 4.17.

The American coastal trader

This type of craft can give you a lot of pleasure to make as a model. Schooner-rigged with two and sometimes three masts, these craft had various local names depending on the different regions they carried. For instance, harkness were lumber carriers, shore duffers carried various goods and other pinkies. There were pinkies and bay carriers.
