

Do You Believe In "Haunted Houses?"

Camille Flammarion, Famous French Scientist, Says He Has 5600 "Authentic" Cases of Spook-Infested Places and Their Inmates "Agonized" by Eerie Spirits

Are there haunted houses?

The average American man will bring his skepticism into play at the thought of Camille Flammarion, world-renowned scientist and astronomer, in the hour sharing the description of the strange man. He is not prepared to attribute the suggestive that ghostly language emitted at times in buildings said to be haunted by spirits of beings who once dwelt in them.

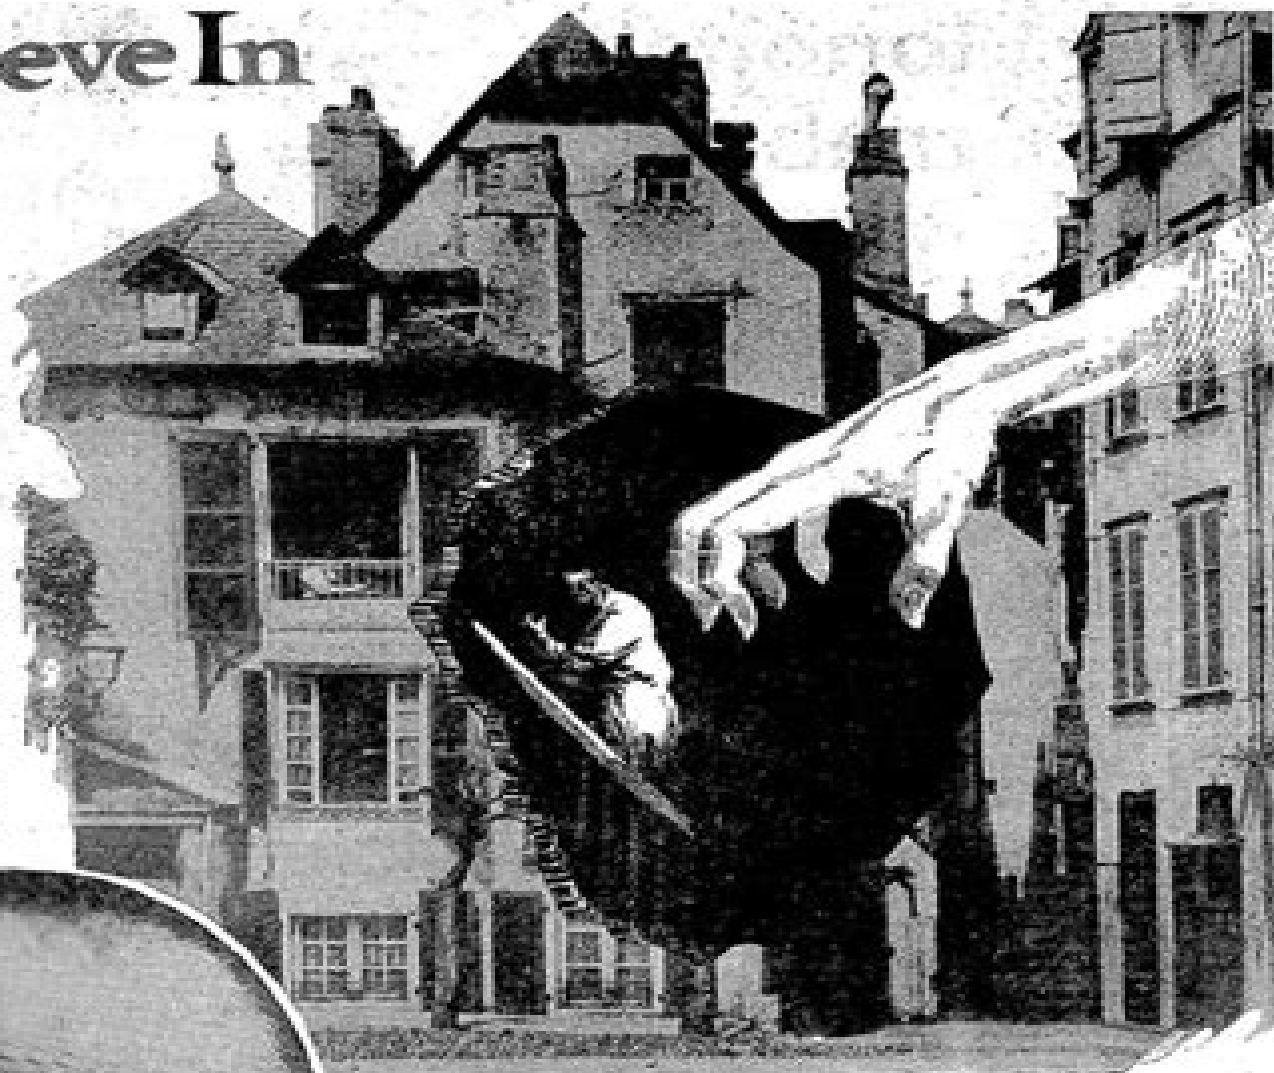

On the other hand, he has compiled a number of 5600 "authentic" cases of haunted houses. From this mass of material he has written a book described as "Supernatural" which will appear shortly.

Science-fiction has gained a most distinguished ally in attempting to find the persons of Flammarion. Since 1881 he has left the roll to make the volume on the mystery of physical science. But a most vivid imagination was always born from the foundation of his scientific research. For him the imagination of material space, which he still maintains as being an error, was mingled with unknown forces, endowed with an intelligence which, added to a determined will, infinite houses on the planet Earth, as well as on the planet Mars, which he feels to be inhabited by beings greater than those in the world we know.

One may, perhaps, be justified in describing his forthcoming book as "The Supernatural." But few will deny the weight given this volume by the addition of Flammarion's algorithm coupled with the announcement that the facts he communicates are "authentic."

"It is incredible," he states, "that nature, unknown as well as impossible, is demonstrated in the visible universe. We must therefore who do not even know the true nature of man—that there are other forces, beings of a different type and with a completely rearranged intelligence, those existing in the invisible universe, as well as in the visible universe."

In the little village of Comacine, France, a Protestant writer named M. Herman Charlot took up his abode in a lonely house said to be visited nightly by "spirits of hell." Seven nights passed safely, but on the eighth night, in mounting the stairs, M. Charlot was suddenly stopped by an unseen hand, his wife cried out loudly for help when women hands clutched at her feet, while their baby vanished completely from its cradle and was later found on a nearby table on the floor below.

have played on them by human hands. They were hardly watching the same manifestation of human will and intensity and they were confident that no human other than themselves had been in or near the house that night. M. Charlot had been stopped vigorously, and yet there was no one visible near him at the time. "He was there and certain things he said the next day had made the remark. His wife had been quite alone when her feet were clutched."

When asked what he thought of this man, Paul, Charles Richet, one of the leading scientists of France and author of several treatises dealing with the subject of metaphysical studies said: "As I am not in a position to offer any view of an individual, I do not wish to say anything. But I am very much interested in the story."

Glid a room in which there was not a trace of fire and which seemed to the last limit which it seemed to escape.

Another of the many incidents recorded in Flammarion's book is the case of the house known in Paris as the Rue de la Harpe, near the Louvre, which was visited by a host of personalities in 1840. The house was calculated at the time, and the peculiarities recorded of passing stones and pieces of wall from walls being broken, including huge stones which could not have been thrown by human hands because of the weight and size. After several a careful watch, but with the greatest caution, the subject of the incident was finally able to find the means to enter the house as they would enter through the main garden entrance. Through the house he found a room in which there was not a trace of fire and which seemed to the last limit which it seemed to escape.

perform its own laws, and Flammarion was deeply convinced that such a fact could be made in some degree, he said, that scientists have been able to gain considerable information about the stars and planets millions of miles away, and yet are in total ignorance of what lies directly under their feet at a depth of eight or nine miles.

Long since it was said: "Flammarion's opening into world phenomena again by the discovery of the strange vision of this fact, the fact that without with another heavenly body and was paid—read a mass of facts. With the addition of the vision of the most important in the universe. It was great greater than the knowledge of the world, which is evidenced by the fact that Flammarion's book is now a best-seller in France and in other countries."
