Law In Society:

Law, Society, and Political Action Thomas Mathiesen, 1980 Breaking down into three distinct but related parts it enters first into a study of the sociology of law For its starting point this section contends that the law is shaped and reshaped by ever changing material structures in society Simultaneously the law works back on these structures to reinforce and conserve them This materialist thesis is substantiated by an analysis of legal developments in a series of political fields the development of penal law financial law and labour protection law amongst others A close scrutiny of the social organization of the legal superstructure including an amusing and telling analysis of the modes of behaviour of those at the summit of the legal profession concludes the first section The dependence of law on the material structure of society cannot be satisfactorily accounted for however without also examining the relationship between the law and other systems of ideas and between those ideas and the social formation in which they appear Accordingly the central part of this book considers also religion art and science The author distinguishes between superconstructing or conserving idea systems and those which enter into a truly dialectical relationship with the material structure to produce a new totality He argues that in the late capitalist social formation the law is superconstructing whereas science has a dialectical relationship with the world It remains however a political question whether or not dialectical ideas systems are desirable that is repression abolishing In the final section Mathiesen identifies reform or revolution as a false dichotomy which must be transcended These chapters are aimed at revitalizing a flagging radical political movement through coherent and cogent discussion of organization and political strategy In this part of the book the author develops further the notion of the unfinished political movement first conceived in his earlier work The Politics of Abolition Martin Robertson 1974 This volume has direct relevance to a broad field of social and political scientists and workers In particular it should be read by sociologists social workers criminologists lawyers and law students It will also be of value as text material for courses in the sociology of law and jurisprudence
