National Technical Information Service, 1974 Innate immunity and neurodegenerative disorders Roger A Barker, Francesca Cicchetti, 2014-11-03 Inflammation of the brain in the context of neurodegenerative disorders is an area of intense debate and discussion not least in terms of its pathogenic significance and the extent to which it drives disease processes and pathology This inflammation can take several forms including innate responses recruiting microglia humoral responses involving antibody complement mediated processes and cellular T cell activation of which the role and extent of each may differ between diseases Whilst some diseases have been more intensely linked to inflammation and long term degeneration e g MS more traditional chronic neurodegenerative disorders have been thought of in terms of intrinsic neuronal pathology with a secondary innate response However it has been described that microglia activation is an early event of many degenerative disorders and evidence is accumulating that it may play a critical role in actually causing pathology and driving disease processes If true this would have major therapeutic implications but what is the evidence that this is the case The initial observations by Patrick McGeer's group of post mortem tissue from patients with Parkinson's disease revealed the presence of activated brain microglia and has thus lead to the hypothesis that chronic inflammation could participate to neuronal degenerative processes The significance of these original observations has only been recently revisited and the development of more powerful tools to study the brain immune response has certainly contributed to this field of research Chronic inflammation in the brain can take many forms but of particular interest has been the resident microglia and the role they play in this process In this context microglia have often been thought to become activated only after the disease has begun and then to contribute minimally to the degenerative process Emerging new concepts challenge this view by proposing that microglial senescence for example may release the disease process and or accelerate it In addition microglia once activated can adopt different phenotypes which can be both pro inflammatory and pro repair and may impact not only on the healthy adult neuronal population but on those new neurons derived from neurogenic niches of the adult brain In this Research Topic we attempt to explore this by first considering the innate immune responses in the brain and the methods by which they can be studied experimentally and in patients with various neurodegenerative disorders. This sets the scene for then discussing a range of different disorders including Alzheimer's Parkinson's Huntington's disease and amyotrophic lateral sclerosis These papers seek to discuss the evidence for an innate immune response and whether this is beneficial or detrimental as well as its therapeutic implications Resource Publication ,1965 Thomas Register of American Manufacturers, 2002 This basic source for identification of U S manufacturers is arranged by product in a large multi volume set Includes Products services Company profiles and Catalog file Research Grants Index National Institutes of East European Accessions Index ,1960 Health (U.S.). Litman, Larry J. Dishaw, 2014-01-22 The multitude of cells signaling pathways receptors novel genetic recombination mechanisms and interactive pathways of receptor function and cell differentiation that constitute the vertebrate adaptive immune system are integrally linked with the multicomponent innate immune system At first glance the levels of complexity seen in both systems at the phylogenetic level of mammals present what seem to be insurmountable hurdles in terms of achieving a systematic understanding of the evolution of immunity New research directions and approaches suggest that resolution of many long standing questions in this area is now possible Historically immunologists considered lower vertebrates and invertebrates as simpler forms i e they were expected to possess more basic less layered levels of immunological complexity and thus potentially would serve as important resources By considering the systematic placement of representative species in the context of phylogeny characterizing their immune receptors co receptors as well as accessory molecules and evaluating responses to immunologic stimuli it was thought that a clearer picture of immune evolution would emerge There is no doubt that this approach has achieved some notable successes but for the most part it has fallen short in terms of achieving a broad understanding of the immunologic needs of many relevant models and how adaptive change in immune function is effected Even if a structurally relevant ortholog of an immune effector is identified in a model organism there is no reason to assume that it functions in a corresponding manner in disparate phylogenetic taxa For example survival of a sessile marine invertebrate whose anatomical form puts it in open and contiguous contact with a literal sea of microorganisms and viruses would be thought to depend at least in part on a capable immune response however at present we have no real understanding of how this is achieved in an integrated manner Furthermore questions arise as to whether or not phenomena that are considered integral components of vertebrate type immunity such as memory tolerance somatic change and clonal selection exist in invertebrates and if their functions parallel those recognized in mammals More often than not our interpretations are guided by preconceived notions that are based on observations made in distant species that often do not apply to far removed taxa. We anticipate that major advances in our understanding of this broad subject are now forthcoming as resources exist or are being developed for examining important model organisms in their natural environments instead of within the confines of in vitro systems of potentially remote physiological significance Taking a wide range of hypotheses observations and interpretations into account in this special topic contributors have developed a comprehensive overview emphasizing new directions and interpretations for understanding basic aspects of immunity that consider unique features inherent to various model systems their life histories and habitats Approaches applied with key model organisms maintained and confronted with relevant challenges under natural conditions are emphasized Current concepts of self and nonself are addressed not only in terms of immunity but also reproductive fitness How genetic variation in immune effector molecules is achieved and maintained in natural populations is examined particular attention is directed to response interfaces that factor in symbiotic interactions Gene expansion and mechanisms of genetic diversification are explored How diverse molecules and a variety of effector cells contribute to our broad understanding of the evolution of a remarkably complex integrated system and how this work is facilitating our understanding of mammalian immunity is addressed
