

assembled after painting. (It must be done before the most suitable medium for painting horses. However, I do give the horse a base coat of enamel in the colour I have selected before proceeding with oil colours.

Horses present such a wide spectrum of colour choices that I can only suggest you study as many colour pictures from books, calendars, posters, and postcards as you can before you start to paint a miniature horse. Being a horse artist, I have collected countless references and usually select a specific one in my head. Remember 'greys', as white horses are always called, are never really all white. They have subtle shades of grey, mixed sometimes with hints of yellow, brown, or pink, and can be dappled with spots of strawberry colour. Greys by far the greatest variety in markings. You will discover with constant observation. A very white grey may have a pinkish well as a black mane and tail; a very dark grey may have a sparkling white tail. Then there are palominos, piebalds and skewbalds, buckskins, as well as the standard bays, chestnuts, blacks - to say nothing of such markings as blazes, stars, snips, and stripes on coronets, pasterns, fetlocks, socks on the legs - all of which must be noted in the myriad choices open to you in painting of your cavalry figure. Remember, when choosing a colour, the artist favoured the mounting of horses on similarly coloured horses, and the exigencies often precluded the use of such as cuirassiers and dragoons, dark horses whereas lancers, hussars preferred lighter colours. European hussars had pale horses. Trumpeters and mounted on greys, and kettle drummers on skewbalds.

When painting a horse, that is an important part when it comes to vitality. Very little shading of the eye being filled in with a black shading into a black shading of the eye usually has a dark area immediately around the eye rather than the all-over
