

Parents of Psychiatrically Hospitalized Children: A Decade of Changing Perceptions

Ann Jacobs Mooney, A.C.S.W.

ABSTRACT: Psychiatric hospitals for children have changed dramatically during the last decade. The lengths of hospitalizations have been shortened; the psychopathology of children qualifying for admission is more severe, often with neurological or biochemical components. In some hospitals, there has been an increasing emphasis on research. All of these changes have affected the staff's perceptions of the children's parents; these changes appear to have resulted in a more supportive, less critical attitude toward these parents. This may be significant in increasing parents' confidence in coping with their child's illness and their family's stress. The need for empirical, longitudinal research is emphasized.

When a child is hospitalized on a psychiatric unit, the parents are crucial to the evaluation and treatment of that child. While the importance of parents to their child's inpatient treatment may seem obvious, it is a topic which has been surprisingly rare in recent literature, and certainly warrants further empirical study (Blotcky et al., 1984). During the last decade, I have been a social worker whose roles have included child therapist, parent and family therapist, and research co-investigator at a children's psychiatric hospital affiliated with a large midwestern university. I have found that the view of these children's parents, in the eyes of hospital staff, has been a slowly evolving one. A review of the evolution of these perceptions may have significance both for clinical implications and for potential research.
