

Medium Theory

JOSHUA MEYROWITZ
University of New Hampshire

Medium theory stands apart from more generic "media theory" in its exploration of the influences of communication technologies in addition to, and distinct from, the specific content (messages) they convey. Medium theorists argue that media are not simply channels for transmitting information between two or more environments, but are themselves distinct social-psychological settings or environments that encourage certain types of interaction and discourage others (→ Media). Medium theory analyzes differences among communication environments.

Medium theory focuses on the characteristics of each medium (or of each type of medium) that make it physically, socially, and psychologically different from other media. Thus, medium theorists study how television differs from radio, but also how electronic media (including TV and radio) differ from print media (such as books, magazines, and newspapers). Medium theory also examines how communications through a particular medium or type of medium compare and contrast with face-to-face interaction. The singular "medium" is used in the name of the theory to highlight the focus on the particular characteristics of each medium.

CHARACTERISTICS OF MEDIA

In comparing and contrasting modes of communication, medium theorists explore the influences of such characteristics as the type of sensory information the medium can and cannot transmit (e.g., visual, aural, tactile, etc.; → Modality and Multimodality); whether the medium is uni-sensory or multi-sensory; the nature of the medium-conveyed form, or forms, of information within each sense (e.g., picture vs. written word as distinct types of visuals, or Morse-code clicks vs. voice as distinct types of sound); the speed and degree of immediacy of communication through the medium; whether the medium affords unidirectional vs. bidirectional vs. multidirectional communication; whether interaction through the medium is simultaneous or sequential (as in the difference between telephones and CB radio); the physical requirements for using the medium (e.g., whether one has to stay in a certain location or look in a certain direction to attend to the medium); the degree of control the user has over reception and transmission (such as when readers choose their own pace and order of reading articles in a newspaper vs. the fixed speed and sequence of a news broadcast); the scope and nature of dissemination (e.g., how many people in how many different locations can attend to the same message
