Trust Across Borders Tat Koon Koh, Mark Fichman, Robert E. Kraut, 2014 This study focuses on trust formation and development in global buyer supplier relationships Trust affects all business relationships especially global business to business B2B transactions due to the distances between buyers and suppliers We use information signaling theory to examine how information indices and signals affect buyers trust in suppliers in global B2B commerce Specifically we examine how buyers trust is affected by 1 their perceptions of the national integrity and legal structure of suppliers country and 2 third party verifications of suppliers on B2B exchanges

Because buyer supplier relationships usually evolve over time we study how the effects of indices and signals change as the number of transactions between the partners increases A survey of global organizational buyers finds that perceptions of national integrity legal structure and supplier verifications are all positively related to buyers trust However the number of prior transactions between buyers and suppliers moderates the impact of perceived legal structure on buyers trust
