Jensen,2005 The purpose of this study was to determine the strategies that make management in a middle school classroom successful The methodology consisted of observing six middle school classrooms in one school The findings indicated that for a classroom to have minimal management difficulties one must have clear expectations of student behavior and a firm discipline in place that is used with consistency In addition teachers must reinforce positive behavior and acknowledge those who are behaving appropriately Furthermore teachers who consistently use positive comments in their classrooms have less discipline disruptions For some putting students in rows is easier to manage and when a trusting relationship is established grouping can be introduced In conclusion the findings of this study introduced strategies that teachers can use to help manage their middle school classroom
