Great Gray Plague Raymond F. Jones,2016-01-22 Dr William Baker was fifty and didn t mind it a bit Fifty was a tremendously satisfying age With that exact number of years behind him a man had stature that could be had in no other way Younger men who achieve vast things at say thirty five are always spoken of with their age as a factor And no matter what the intent of the connection when a man s accomplishments are linked to the number of years since he was born there is always a sense of apologia about it But when a man is fifty his age is no longer mentioned His name stands alone on whatever foundation his achievements have provided He has stature without apology if the years have been profitably spent William Baker considered his years had been very profitably spent He had achieved the Ph D and the D Sc degrees in the widely separated fields of electronics and chemistry He had been responsible for some of the most important radar developments of the World War II period And now he held a post that was the crowning achievement of those years of study and effort On this day of his fiftieth birthday he walked briskly along the corridor of the Bureau building He paused only when he came to the glass door which was lettered in gold National Bureau of Scientific Development Dr William Baker Director He was unable to regard that door without a sense of pride But he was convinced the pride was thoroughly justifiable He turned the knob and stepped into the office Then his brisk stride came to a pause He closed the door slowly and frowned The room was empty Neither his receptionist nor his secretary who should have been visible in the adjoining room were at their posts Through the other open door at his left he could see that his administrative assistant Dr James Pehrson was not at his desk The
