

DEFERENCE TO SCIENTIFIC AUTHORITY AMONG A LOW INFORMATION PUBLIC: UNDERSTANDING U.S. OPINION ON AGRICULTURAL BIOTECHNOLOGY

Dominique Brossard and Matthew C. Nisbet

ABSTRACT

This study uses the contemporary debate over agricultural biotechnology to conceptualize a theoretical model that can be used to explain how citizens reach judgments across a range of science and technology controversies. We report findings from a mail survey of New York State residents that depicts a 'low information' public relying heavily on heuristics such as value predispositions, trust, and schema to form an opinion about agricultural biotechnology. Science knowledge does play a modest role, with the news media serving as an important source of informal learning. Contrary to expectations and past research, we do not find any direct effects for news attention on support for agricultural biotechnology. Deference to scientific authority is a central value predisposition shaping support for agricultural biotechnology. Positively correlated with education, deference to scientific authority is the strongest influence on support for agricultural biotechnology in our model. Part of the variable's influence is direct, but part of it is also indirect, as deference to scientific authority is a key predictor of both trust in the sponsors of biotechnology and generalized reservations about the impacts of science.

Over the past decade, a growing number of studies have examined public opinion within the context of science and technology conflicts. These debates offer valuable opportunities for exploring opinion processes since they typically include developments remote from ordinary citizen experience, and are characterized by highly technical discourse. Public reaction is an important social dimension in these conflicts, with citizen opinion shaping the trajectory of scientific development and technological adoption. In post-industrial societies where issues ranging from stem cell research to climate change have at times come to dominate transnational agendas, and where expertise and knowledge
