

Second-Language Learning: A Social Psychological Perspective*

R. C. Gardner, P. C. Smythe, R. Clément and L. Glikman

In an earlier issue of the CMLR Gardner and Smythe described the formation of the Language Research Group and also discussed some of the results obtained in the Group's initial research projects.<sup>1</sup> This report presents some results from a three year longitudinal study of students at five grade levels learning French as a second language. This research is being conducted in seven different geographic regions in Canada. This project is currently in progress and will require several months to complete before a final report can be made. The present report is, in a sense, an interim report. There is always some danger in presenting results of a study still in progress; however, we welcome the opportunity to share some of our preliminary findings and speculations based on this new data. As the title of this paper implies the orientation of the Language Research Group is more of a social psychological nature than an educational one. We are convinced, however, that such an orientation has particular implications for second-language teachers. This paper is organized around four central themes. The first three sections deal with some of the roles of attitudes in second-language acquisition suggested by a social psychological interpretation of the processes involved.<sup>2</sup> One other report prepared by this Group considers the more general issue of social psychological factors in second language acquisition, and an extensive annotated bibliography has been produced.<sup>3</sup> The final section examines several popular extracurricular programs designed to improve student attitudes and motivation.

Second Language Achievement: The Role of Attitudes and Motivation

Considerable research has been conducted on the relationship between a number of attitudinal variables and indices of achievement in a second language. The initial study in this sequence was conducted by Gardner and Lambert<sup>4</sup> who administered a battery of tests, involving measures of language aptitude and attitudinal/motivational characteristics to a group of Grade Eleven anglophone students in Montreal. In addition, they obtained ratings from the teachers of the students' ability to speak and understand French. The correlations among these measures were factor analysed. Four factors were obtained, but only two showed any relationship to the measure of second-language achievement. These two factors were identified as a language aptitude and an attitudinal/motivational factor respectively. The conclusion drawn from this study was that two independent factors were

*This project was funded by the Department of the Secretary of State under its program to encourage language research in Canada.
