Abstract

Introduction: Remote delivery of care improves outcomes following hypertensive disorders of pregnancy, but little is known about the implementation of a multidisciplinary clinic in the virtual space. In this study, we developed a multidisciplinary postpartum hypertension clinic with a telehealth component run jointly with Maternal-Fetal Medicine and Cardiology.

Materials and Methods: Women were referred from Cardiology and Obstetrics providers or through our postpartum remote blood pressure (BP) program and were offered the option of an in-person or telemedicine visit. For virtual visits, BP was recorded by home measurement. We compared clinical and demographic characteristics by visit type (virtual vs. in-person).

Results: Of 175 patients scheduled (2019–2021), 140 attended visits (80% show rate) a mean of 11 weeks postpartum, with 92 (65.7%) seen virtually and 48 (34.2%) seen in-person. Clinical and demographic factors, including self-reported race and insurance type, did not differ between women seen virtually versus in-person. Overall, 97 (69.3%) of women were still on antihypertensive agents at the time of their visit with 33 (34.0%) on more than one antihypertensive agent, which did not differ by visit type. Women who were seen virtually lived a farther distance from the clinic (median 11.6 [interquartile range; IQR 7.7, 30.8] vs. median 7.9 [IQR 5.8, 21.1] miles;  $p = 0.02$ ).

Conclusions: Implementation of a multidisciplinary postpartum hypertension clinic in the virtual space is feasible, targets women at high risk for persistently elevated postpartum BP, and maintains equal attendance compared with in-person visits. Virtual visits deliver care equitably across different racial and socioeconomic groups and may improve access to care in rural areas.
