Evolution Of Oblitacythereis From Paleoc:

Evolution of Oblitacythereis from Paleocosta (Ostracoda, Trachyleberididae) During the Cenozoic in the Mediterranean and Atlantic Richard Hall Benson, 1977 A new ostracode genus Oblitacythereis containing two new subgenera the nominotypical form and the older Paleoblitacythereis containing two new species O O mediterranea and O P luandaensis and one old species new designation O P ruggierii Russo have been demonstrated to have descended from a common ancestral stock new genus Paleocosta of the genus Costa the nominate form of the tribe Costini This genus contains heavily costate species whose history has been one of invasion of the greater depths of Tethys which became thermospheric in the middle Miocene Species of subgenus Paleoblitacythereis became adapted to upper slope and warm basinal habitats and underwent considerable modification of its carapace structure When Tethys became extinct as a marine environment at the end of the Miocene subgenus Paleoblitacythereis was eradicated in the Mediterranean region but survived in the Atlantic where it lives today Its descendant subgenus Oblitacythereis invaded the newly formed Mediterranean in the Early Pliocene structurally modified to live in cooler water The history of Oblitacythereis was traceable because of a detailed analysis of structural and form homology substantiated by quantitative Theta Rho test Evolutionary Biology and Ecology of Ostracoda David J. Horne, Koen Martens, 2000-05-31 Theme 3 of the 13th International Symposium on Ostracoda ISO 97 Ecology and Systematics of Foraminifera in Two Thalassia Habitats, Jamaica, West Indies Martin A. Buzas, Roberta K. Smith, Kenneth A. Beem, 1977 Homogeneous Thalassia beds in back reef flat less than 1 m and Discovery Bay about 3 m were sampled for 12 successive months in Jamaica West Indies Living foraminifera were enumerated in each of four monthly replicates consisting of 20 ml of sediment At the sampling times water temperature sediment temperature salinity oxygen saturation water pH sediment pH sediment median sediment sorting turbidity particulate organic carbon Thalassia weight and weight percent silt plus clay were measured In all 18 644 individuals belonging to 143 species were picked sorted and identified The back reef flat habitat contained 7 745 individuals belonging to 115 species while the Discovery Bay contained 10 899 individuals belonging to 117 species Fisher s log series fits the distribution of species abundances at both habitats well The number of species information function and equitability are usually greater at Discovery Bay for individual 20 ml samples A general linear model consisting of parameters for station differences overall periodicity interaction of station differences and overall periodicity and environmental variables was constructed The densities of the 19 most abundant species were statistically analyzed individually univariate and simultaneously multivariate Univariate analyses indicate six species have significant station differences 95% level and seven exhibit periodicity The environmental variables are not significant for any of the species Multivariate analyses indicate a significant difference between stations and an overall periodicity As in the univariate analyses environmental variables are not significant The results suggest that in tropical habitats changes in species densities are regulated biotically The new species Ammonia jacksoni Elphidium norvangi Fissurina goreaui Discorbinella minuta

Glabratella altispira and G compressa are described Taxonomic remarks are presented for most of the species
