

Counseling Therapy Approaches

8 pages | 1932 words

This course really opened my eyes into the roles and responsibilities I will have to take up as a therapist. Every approach we have studied throughout this course has given me an “attitude”, technique, or perspective that I will not only use in my practice, but also applies to myself in my own life. A very special person in my life is always telling me to live authentically; after this course, I understand what that means. I have changed nearly every aspects of my life throughout this semester and now live a healthy happy life. I have come to realize that being a therapist is not just a job; it is a way of life. “Effective therapists are authentic, sincere, and honest.

They do not hide behind a rigid role or facades. Who they are in their personal life and their professional work is congruent,” (Corey, 2013). Living authentically will help me foster the strong therapeutic bond with my clients—which is key to successful therapy. Below, I have listed a few of the ideas that have had the most influence on my understanding of how to work with clients.

From Person-Centered therapy I took unconditional positive regard. Learning to care for, accept, and value a person as they are will give a greater chance for success in therapy as clients sense my authenticity. Learning to separating overt behaviors from the person is also key. “The caring is non-possessive and is not contaminated by evaluation or judgment of the client’s feelings, thoughts, and behavior as good or bad” (Corey, 2013).

In Gestalt therapy I learned the importance of awareness and integrating the functions of body and mind. As everybody knows, if you do not work out, your muscles get flaccid. What most people don’t realize is that your brain also stays in better shape when you exercise, and not just challenging your mind by, for example, learning a new language, doing difficult crosswords or taking on other intellectually stimulating tasks. As researchers are finding, physical exercise is critical to vigorous mental health, too.

I have gained much more understanding of how to work with consumers with mental health and addiction issues, but these three ideas have had the greatest impact. Learning to live authentically, accept others for who they are and keeping a fit mind and body have had the greatest impact on me and will guide my interaction with clients and encourage them to follow such in their own lives. As much as I would like to be “eclectic,” I think that until I have gained experience-counseling clients, I will focus my therapy around a few specific approaches through theoretical integration.

These theories include Gestalt therapy, Existential therapy, and Cognitive behavior therapy. Because Gestalt therapy can be applied to such a wide range of problems and population and is especially well suited for the initial phases of crisis intervention work, I intend to apply it in my work with veterans and their families. Applying its key concepts such as Perls’s style: “moving the client from environmental support to...
